IV. Reading test 20%

Desert is the dominant landscape of our solar system. Mars shivers in its aridity while Venus bakes. Yet both worlds could well have had brief lush periods. Earth has managed to keep its oceans and foster life. Still, a third of our landmass is arid, and scientists warn we could tip our climate toward that of Mars or Venus.

Deserts have challenged man since antiquity. Our earliest civilizations sprang out of deserts. They are commanding attention today. We have begun to realize the vast mineral wealth and the enormous solar energy potential they contain. Many see the desert as the world's last reservoirs of open space, frontiers that man can farm and make habitable with new technology.

But first we must contend with the past and present. People living in the desert, and especially on its fragile fringes have made too many mistakes. Deserts are unforgiving. Particularly in the past fifty to one hundred years they have begun to expand at an alarming rate. This global phenomenon has been given the name "desertification". The United Nations estimated that each year the process claims an amount of land almost equal in size to the U.S. state of Maine. Moreover, the land that the U.N. says is in danger of future desertification equals the area of the United States, Russia, and Australia combined.

Yet all is not bleak. Even as we are losing ground in some places, technology is reclaiming land in others. New techniques may not only help us tame our own deserts but also let us someday colonize those on the moon or Mars.
